

Mrs. Easton who conducted the second-hand furniture store at 338 south Broad Street and that she disappeared about 10 or 12 years ago; that when she left she owed him a bill of $14.00. He then looked over some old account books with his daughter and found an entry which showed that Mrs. Easton's account was dated Feb. 16, 1914 and had a balance of $14.10 unpaid. It was about this time that Mrs. Easton disappeared. He added that he had not seen her since. He further stated that she lived here with a man named Easton who he (Silverstein) believed to be her husband and a small boy about 12 years of age and a small girl about 10 or 11 years old. Mrs. Easton occupied rooms in the 2 upper floors of the building that she often brought a customer to his store and would speak German to him (Silverstein) and told him to charge over his regular price for the article bought so that she (Easton) could make a little commission on the customer which he often did, turning the money over to Mrs. Easton. He remarked that she is a wise business woman and made a lot of money bringing customers to him but that he would not believe anything she would say; that she used to drive a horse and wagon and go out into the country parts around Trenton and buy up furniture; that she had a mule and the boy often rode this mule around the streets; that she seemed to be the boss; that her husband helps around the store and has very little to say; that he (Silverstein) had many business transactions with her. I asked him if he had ever heard of a murder on the Pennington Road and he replied that he never had. He remarked that Mrs. Easton was a great talker and often talked in German to him and that he could identify her if he saw her; that her husband appeared to be much older than she; that she rented the building at 338 South Broad Street
